On April 19, 2018, Unilever N.V. sent the following information in an email to a member of the press:

1. The Remuneration policy can be found in the annual report:
https://www.unilever.com/Images/unilever-annual-report-and-accounts-2017_tcm244-516456_en.pdf

A summary of the key elements starts on page 47 and 48.

Our reaction to these questions is as follows:

- The new remuneration policy is simpler, longer term and requires greater personal commitment through share ownership to drive reward.
- Over the last decade Unilever has built a strong performance culture with the Unilever Sustainable Living Plan (USLP) at its heart. Our people have a track record of delivering consistent top and bottom line growth. We want all of them to feel and act like owners of the business.
- The approach is something we've already rolled out to top 3000 executives in the company. It has been fully welcomed as best practice.

- This latest development extends that to our executive directors.
- There has been full shareholder consultation on our remuneration policy and all is fully disclosed (page 47 of ARA)

With regard to the executive directors:

- Target total pay is closely aligned to the previous structure
- The same levels of total pay can only be earned over a longer performance period
- The same levels of total pay require much greater personal investment in Unilever shares.
- We have put safeguards in place to prevent higher levels of pay than before, unless they are fully justified by outstanding business performance.

2. In respect of the comments made in the media with regard to shareholder support for a headquarters in the Netherlands, the following:

We do not believe these reports reflect the views of Unilever shareholders at large, with whom we have engaged extensively. In those discussions shareholders have confirmed their support for our proposal, recognising that it offers the best means to drive long-term performance and value. There is a small group of shareholders whose holding may be directly affected by our proposal and we will continue to engage with them. We remain highly confident of achieving the required level of shareholder support at a vote scheduled for Q3 this year

In an article from Reuters this morning Graeme Pitkethly specifically mentions this and is frequently quoted:

Unilever confident shareholders will agree to go Dutch

LONDON (Reuters) - Unilever (ULVR.L)(UNc.AS) believes shareholders will support it moving its primary headquarters to the Netherlands, even though there is some reticence among investors who may be forced to sell their shares.

The Anglo-Dutch consumer goods group announced last month that it had picked Rotterdam over London for its main home base after collapsing its dual-headed structure, seen as a blow to the British government a year before Brexit.

Yes, there are one or two investors who are negatively impacted, but all of the investors we've seen and it's a tremendous broad sweep of our investors support the board's decision, Chief Financial Officer Graeme Pitkethly told Reuters on Thursday, following release of Unilever's first-quarter sales figures.

We're very confident that we'll get through this process, he added.

Shareholders will vote on the move later this year. The company needs approval from 75 percent of its UK shareholder base and 50 percent of the Dutch base to move forward with the plan, which is aimed at simplifying its structure, and making it easier to issue equity and execute large-scale M&A.

Last month, UK investor Columbia Threadneedle raised concerns about the move, which could affect Unilever's inclusion in London's blue-chip FTSE 100 index .FTSE.

Other big shareholders share their concerns. The Financial Times on Wednesday reported that four were extremely worried about the proposal, and that Unilever has quietly set up meetings with UK investors to convince them of its merits.

All shareholder discussions are quiet because they're private discussions, Pitkethly told Reuters. We have had an open door to all of our shareholders, we've engaged extremely widely.

Unilever says it will maintain a premium listing on the London Stock Exchange, and is in discussions about maintaining its part in the FTSE.

We continue a dialogue with the FTSE, Pitkethly said, noting the dialogue has been very interesting so far. We would be delighted to be included in all the indices, obviously. That would be a fantastic outcome for us but it's not in our gift.

3. Regarding the listing after Simplification I already indicated in our discussion that we are in discussion with the most important index providers about the impact of Simplification on our presence on the most important indices: We'll maintain a premium listing on the LSE and we think that's important to allow UK shareholders to continue to invest in Unilever. (You will find quotes from Graeme Pitkethly in the above article.)

4. We furthermore spoke about the total shareholder return. On page 73 of the annual report you will find the historical total shareholder return for the last 9 years. Divided into NV, PLC in FTSE 100 and AEX.
