CEO: Company will recast itself

By Bobby White

Blockbuster will continue to recast itself as more than just a video rental store in its fight to stay relevant against mounting competition, Chief Executive John Antioco said Wednesday.

Let's not forget the role desperation plays in keeping in touch with the customer, Antioco said half-jokingly before a crowd of about 300 in Dallas.

Antioco was part of Southern Methodist University's management briefing series at the Wyndham Anatole hotel in Dallas.

Blockbuster, based in Dallas, has launched a hostile $991.6 million bid for Hollywood Video, which reached a merger agreement with rental chain Movie Gallery in early January.

The Federal Trade Commission is investigating whether Blockbuster's acquisition of Hollywood would violate antitrust laws.

With such an influx of competition from brick-and-mortar rental chains and major retail chains, which have cut into rentals by selling DVDs, Antioco said the purchase of Hollywood would not result in higher video rental prices.

We are not eliminating competition, he said.

Antioco said Blockbuster has three opportunities to regain customers: monthly rental subscriptions, movie and video game trading, and video game sales. The company has created an in-store subscription service under which customers pay a monthly fee to rent unlimited videos.

Transforming an established brand isn't easy, Antioco said.

The company eliminated late fees and has launched an online DVD rental service to compete with Netflix.

Antioco said Blockbuster will invest $150 million in the online venture before it expects a profit. Antioco said the online service won't hurt the rental business.

Here we have this entrenched competitor, Antioco said. We have got to get over the possibility of cannibalizing ourself.
