Mornings with Maria

Fox Business Network

December 14th, 2017 6-9 AM

Maria Bartiromo, Host: Welcome back. Breaking news this morning: Disney and 21st Century Fox making it official. Disney will pay $52.4 billion to acquire the entertainment assets, international properties, and regional sports networks from 21st Century Fox. 21st Century Fox, of course, is the parent of the Fox Business Network, which is among the assets that Fox will hold onto, as well as Fox News, Fox Sports 1, and Fox broadcast assets. It's an all-stock deal that will leave current Fox investors owning roughly a quarter of the new bigger Disney Company. Joining me right now by telephone is the executive chairman of 21st Century Fox, Rupert Murdoch. Rupert, thank you so much for walking us through this deal this morning. Good morning.

Rupert Murdoch: Good morning, Maria.

Maria Bartiromo: You know, we're looking at, really, your incredible legacy and history — this caps a half a century of expansion for you, expansion in media. I guess the first question is why now? Why sell the entertainment assets in these properties today?

Rupert Murdoch: Well, you know, there's a lot of change coming, people watch television differently — not news or business, but entertainment, that works very differently. We're seeing that with the emergence of new companies. Silicon Valley is inevitably going to spend tens and tens of billions on entertainment programming, so it makes sense to sort of bulk up the entertainment side so that you've got a company that can go direct to consumer in a sort of big way.

Maria Bartiromo: The price — $52.4 billion, and then when you include the debt, $66 billion. How did you arrive at that price, Rupert? Why is that the right price?

Rupert Murdoch: Well, a lot of bargaining. Actually, it's a little bit better than that. They said I think that's $28; on yesterday's price was just $29. So, it's pretty good. And then we think the value of Fox Business and Fox News and Fox Sports and Fox broadcast adds, you know, another 20-odd billion. It's at least — leaving out the debt side, at least 25 — or at least 75 billion or $76 billion of value to our shareholders.

Maria Bartiromo: Wow, that is a big deal, Rupert. Now, the deal includes Fox's 39% stake in satellite broadcaster Sky along with the 20th Century Fox film studio. Are you expecting to close that deal with Sky before this deal closes?

Rupert Murdoch: We're hoping to, we expect to in the next six months, and then that one will go in and I believe that'll increase the debt — increase the debt that goes to Disney. If it doesn't close and they just take what we have, we'll imagine they'll decide to go ahead and make their own bid for the rest of it.

Maria Bartiromo: You know, it's interesting that Bob Iger announced that he was going to stay on as CEO to 2021. Can you give us a sense of what's going on in terms of the leadership of these assets? Anything new to report in that arena?

Rupert Murdoch: Their leadership is solid with Bob Iger, I made it a condition of the deal that he would stay on.

Maria Bartiromo: So that was one of the conditions that you wanted.

Rupert Murdoch: [inaudible] we didn't want to just, you know, someone running it we didn't know.

Maria Bartiromo: And of course, Bob Iger recently announced that Disney's going to start a streaming service. You just said a moment ago, look, people are watching television differently, they're consuming information and media differently. Talk a bit about that, Rupert. How do you see this business changing in the next five years, given the fact that streaming obviously has changed the dynamics, and there's no longer must-see Thursday night or must-see Monday night. You're watching it when you want to watch it.

Rupert Murdoch: No, there's only must-see Fox News and must-see Fox Business.

Maria Bartiromo: That's right, yep.

Rupert Murdoch: No, but that's in real-time. Entertainment is more and more non-linear. We see that with the way people watch the broadcast networks. There's no loyalty to them; there's loyalty to individual programs. And you know, you've got a certain rating, you put it on a certain time. At the end of a week, that will have doubled. At the end of a month, they'll probably re-double again. So, it's very hard to monetize that with advertising.

Maria Bartiromo: Rupert, tell us about the assets that you're keeping. I mean, obviously, you turned a single Australian newspaper into one of the world's largest news empires. You're keeping Fox News, Fox Business, the Wall Street Journal, the New York Post. What is your vision for this new company in terms of what's left after selling the entertainment assets?

Rupert Murdoch: Well, it's going to have a cash flow that's the new Fox, which does not include Wall Street Journal that's News Corporation. All the newspapers are at News Corporation.

Maria Bartiromo: Okay.

Murdoch: A separate $10 billion company. This is what came out of 21st Century Fox. The new Fox will have Fox News, Fox Business, Fox Broadcasting, Fox Sports. But the point is it will have a cash flow at least $2 billion a year after everything. So, you know, we can see expanding that and taking other opportunities and building another great company then.

Maria Bartiromo: You know, in terms of building another great company, you say that people are watching media differently. News is completely a different animal because it's live, it's happening now. Was that part of your thinking in terms of keeping the news assets?

Rupert Murdoch: Yeah, that's it exactly. And, of course, sport. They watch sport in real time.

Maria Bartiromo: Exactly. And while they're watching sport in real time, you've got all these technology companies trying to get a piece of the action. Right? Amazon bidding for sports. You've got Netflix budget alone will be north of $7 billion next year. Is content king once again, Rupert?

Rupert Murdoch: But neither of those are in sport. The one that's coming that's sport is Facebook. They unsuccessfully bid just for the digital rights of half the Indian cricket for $600 million. So that was a warning shot, you know. And they've announced now they're going to spend billions on sports rights. So we don't know which country they'll go after or what they'll do.

Maria Bartiromo: Would you consider combining News Corp. and the remaining assets at Fox, the news assets?

Rupert Murdoch: I don't know. I mean, ideally, yes, but I think that's years away. We'll have to think about it.

Maria Bartiromo: Yeah, because when you look at the media landscape changing, yeah, that's obvious. But even more obvious is what digital has done to the newspaper business. Right?

Rupert Murdoch: Well, digital has hollowed out newspaper advertising completely. There's not a newspaper in the world that hasn't lost about 70 percent of its advertising. So you get cover price rises, you get digital subscriptions that papers like the Wall Street Journal are just life and death.

Maria Bartiromo: So how does the advertising landscape change? I mean, Google, Facebook keep siphoning off advertising dollars, consumers cutting the cord at an accelerating rate. Even Disney lost 12 million ESPN subs over the last few years. What's your vision in terms of how the advertising backdrop changes in the coming years?

Rupert Murdoch: Well, I'm less and less worried about cutting the cord. It is going at a rate, but we have, you know, things like YouTube Live, which Fox News, Fox Business is on in a package worth $35. We have about 50 channels. And then we have Hulu, the new Hulu Extra, whatever they call it, with probably another 50 channels for $39. You've got Direct Now [indistinguishable] is now over a million subscribers. These three services alone are growing very fast and they're almost replacing the cord cutters at the speed of the new cord cutters. I think it will catch that.

Maria Bartiromo: So is part of the reason here is because things are changing so much that scale wins at the end of the day? I mean, when you look at these entertainment assets, look 10 years down the road, do you think they will be lower valued than where they are today, given the changes in consumer habits?

Rupert Murdoch: No, I think well, some yes, some no. I think as far as news and sports, it will always be preeminent and strong. I think that with going direct to consumer, if you're big enough and strong enough and you're global, which Disney will now become the big thing about this is this gives Disney a huge footprint across Europe and India, which they don't have now.

Maria Bartiromo: Yeah.

Rupert Murdoch: So I would be very optimistic about the future of Disney.

Maria Bartiromo: Yeah, let's talk about the India business, Rupert, because a lot of people were saying that's one of the crown jewels that Disney really wanted, which of course you built. And when you look across the globe, that's a different scenario. They're in a different growth period than where we are in the United States. How would you predict growth occurs in the coming years when you look at a place like India and Europe, which is way behind where the U.S. is in terms of this growth story?

Rupert Murdoch: Yes, well, you know, Sky is growing very well both in Britain and in Germany and in Italy are good businesses. That's all one company. And now then go over the top into other countries like Spain. And India, of course, it's even earlier. It's a vast country where there are, I don't know, seven or eight or nine languages. We have an interest in a satellite company there with over 12.5 million customers. All in all, India this year, from nothing a few years ago, will make half-a-billion dollars. And we're very confident within three years that we'll grow to $1 billion.

Maria Bartiromo: Wow.

Rupert Murdoch: It'll all be to Disney's account.

Maria Bartiromo: So size up the landscape for us now. With Disney owning the entertainment assets, that's obviously a juggernaut there, but you've got Amazon in the wings, you've got Apple, you've got others—Google trying to buy content and paying out billions for it. Size up the competitive landscape when it comes to entertainment assets, Rupert.

Rupert Murdoch: Well, they're huge companies with not much cost to capital if you look at them. I don't know how far Amazon wants to go. It's building their basic, their Prime, and leaves it there. I think Facebook coming in and Apple and Netflix are all, you know, going to be big players.

Maria Bartiromo: All right.

Rupert Murdoch: When Disney pull all their—and Fox pull their programs back or stop selling anything to Netflix, it will be interesting how that affects them.

Maria Bartiromo: It really will. And real quick before you go, Rupert, do you have the new name of the new company now?

Rupert Murdoch: It will be Fox.

Maria Bartiromo: Fox.

Rupert Murdoch: We may have to call it the new Fox, New Fox.

Maria Bartiromo: Great. Rupert, great to talk with you. Thanks so much for walking us through it.

Rupert Murdoch: Thank you, Maria. Good luck.

Maria Bartiromo: Okay. We will see you soon. Rupert Murdoch joining me there.
