Editorial Appearing in the Financial News (December 5, 2011):

Exchange merger vital for Asian challenge,

Elmar Brok, 05 Dec 2011

EU and US leaders are well aware that in the current difficult economic environment we are more in need than ever of powerful instruments to shape global financial markets, to stand up for European and US interests, and to compete with fast-rising challengers, mostly from Asia.

In short, what we need are strong transatlantic institutions and companies – with a European base – representing our shared interests. Where they are absent – as is the case with the rating agencies – we risk being marginalised.

But sometimes luck plays into the hands of those who keep trying. As chair of the European Parliament's delegation for US relations, I can see that we now have the historic opportunity to establish a strong transatlantic player and to reshape a part of the global exchange market.

We can ensure that American and European players will integrate more and that their voices will be heard on the global stage – and that they will increasingly speak as one voice, by merging two exchanges: the New York Stock Exchange and Deutsche Börse.

A stronger exchange for the European market alone would already be worth pursuing on its own – simply by linking all major markets in Europe, it would deepen financial integration in the euro area and invigorate Europe's position as a global financial centre against the backdrop of a dramatic loss of competitiveness in the last decade. Let's not be fooled – the Asian financial centres are not merely playing catch-up; they have overtaken, or are close to overtaking us in most aspects. Creating the leading global stock exchange operator, based in the US and Europe, is a first step to regaining this lost competitiveness.

But what makes this merger such a rare opportunity is its meaning for transatlantic co-operation. The US and Europe would jointly own, regulate and supervise critical infrastructure, one crucial part of the backbone of our modern economies. We would build a joint benchmark regarding transparency, regulatory standards, market efficiencies and safety – but, most importantly, its base in Europe and the US would mean that regulators and politicians from both sides of the Atlantic would be forced to converge on joint approaches, shared thinking and common policies.

In addition, this merger would give us a serious shot at kick-starting transatlantic economic co-operation, a structure that generates billions of euros, millions of jobs, about 60% of global gross domestic product and which will be enhanced by a joint jobs and growth initiative launched at last week's EU summit.

This process needs the right kind of players to feed the economic growth that we will depend on in the future, and the merged companies will have an important role in this. It will free up capital and multiply trading opportunities, thereby improving market liquidity, which will in turn benefit companies, mostly small and medium-sized enterprises, on both sides of the Atlantic. These companies are the drivers of job growth. It would also strengthen transatlantic and international capital injections into companies both in Europe and the US.

Partnerships need shared values, but they also need ways to work together on an everyday basis. A jointly owned and jointly based exchange would be one of those coveted instruments. As we face an increasingly multilateral world, the importance of such jointly owned forces cannot be understated.

For both partners, this is a chance to act, to be ahead of the curve and together shape the financial world of tomorrow. Our leaders should not hesitate.

Elmar Brok is a German Member of the European Parliament.
