RADVISION Comments on Press Coverage of Business Dispute

Monday August 22, 5:07 pm ET

FAIR LAWN, N.J.--(BUSINESS WIRE)--Aug. 22, 2005--RADVISION (Nasdaq: RVSN - News) said today that it takes strong exception to today's article in the Washington Post relating to the company's previous relationship with Control Tech.

Gadi Tamari, Chief Executive Officer of RADVISION, stated, "The article contains various false and misleading statements by a former reseller in China that are the result of a commercial dispute and are contradicted by the actual facts. The baseless allegations as published in the article do a great disservice to our company, its employees, investors and business partners."

RADVISION emphasized that its sales practices with respect to Control Tech were appropriate and that its accounting practices are in full compliance with U.S. GAAP. RADVISION is considering legal action to prevent further false and misleading information from being disseminated by Control Tech.

RADVISION noted that its sales to Control Tech were made only on the basis of orders placed by Control Tech, which was legally bound to pay RADVISION for each item purchased, with no right of return. Control Tech did not report to RADVISION on the amount of inventory it was holding nor did RADVISION have any insight into this information. RADVISION duly terminated its exclusive distributor relationship with Control Tech due to continued breaches of the agreement including failure to meet minimum sales targets, violation of the non-competition clause and material customer complaints. These actions were taken after consultation with Control Tech and after providing them with reasonable opportunities to rectify such breaches (which is duly documented). Following termination of the exclusive relationship, Control Tech was allowed to continue to act as a reseller for RADVISION in China.

RADVISION further stated that its representatives have met numerous times with Control Tech in an attempt to resolve all open matters. RADVISION firmly believes that any commercial dispute between the parties (including its many claims against Control Tech) should not be carried out through the media but through good faith negotiations.

The Company also noted that it is currently conducting its sales in China through a multi-tier distribution network and expects to be successful with this new channel approach.
