Portfolio Review

The TAIEX registered a gain of 6.20% in US dollar terms in February. The recent increase in domestic consumption continued in February and produced strong performance for sectors such as food, tourism, and banking, which each increased over 10% in NT dollar terms during the month. Other sectors that prospered in February included iron & steel, paper & forest products, wire & cable, automobiles, tires & accessories, cement and textiles & apparel. The only three sectors that lagged the market were chemicals, electronics, and plastics. The market's average daily turnover rose 30% in February following January's 96% surge, indicating strong market liquidity and rising investor enthusiasm.

In US dollar terms, the Fund returned 4.40% in February. Most of our underperformance can be attributed to the Fund's focus on higher quality stocks, as the market's February gain was driven primarily by lower quality stocks that were playing catch-up. In addition, the Fund's slightly overweight position in the semiconductor sector negatively affected the Fund's performance. Conversely, our overweight position in the steel sector positively affected the performance of the Fund.

For March, we expect the market to continue its upward move, as strong liquidity and the improving economic outlook maintain the market's current momentum. The upcoming presidential election should not put too much pressure on the market as investors aggressively position themselves for any dip. Our view of Taiwan's market remains positive and we expect to see the market continue moving upward in the foreseeable future.
