How Michael Neidorff took Centene from $40 million to $21 billion

By Corey Noles

7 August 2015

Centene CEO Michael Neidorff's $6.3 billion deal to buy Health Net came together in two and a half weeks — an improbable feat without his deal-making experience and small group of trusted executives and outside advisers.

Since joining Centene as CEO in 1996, Neidorff has won major contracts and made more than 25 acquisitions, which catapulted Centene from $40 million in revenue and 40,000 members in 1996 to a national managed care powerhouse with $21 billion in expected revenue for 2015 and 4.6 million members.

In 2001, Neidorff led the company through an initial public stock offering that raised more than $41 million. Today, Centene has a market cap of about $8.32 billion.

St. Louis-based Centene specializes in managed-care Medicaid, Medicare and the federal health insurance marketplace. While it is a substantial company, it remains a smaller player compared with the industry's Big 3: Anthem, Aetna-Humana and UnitedHealth Group. Anthem announced last month that it is buying Cigna in a deal that would create a company with about $115 billion in annual revenue. Earlier in July, Aetna announced a $37 billion merger with Humana, which when combined would also have annual revenue of about $115 billion. UnitedHealth is the top dog with projected 2015 revenue of $154 billion.

Neidorff wants to run with the big dogs and has insisted his company is a buyer, not a seller. Still, as recently as May, Centene was named by Leerink Partners LLC analyst Ana Gupte as a possible target of St. Louis-based Ascension Health.

Reeling in the net

Neidorff told the Business Journal that he began considering a bid for Health Net several months ago as the insurer's name kept coming up in talks with industry associates and bankers.

Neidorff knew Health Net CEO Jay Gellert through their time on the board of America's Health Insurance Plans, the industry's trade association, and got together with him in the spring over dinner while in California. Nothing came of it specifically, Neidorff said, but things began to come together shortly after that.

It's very important to have the momentum and get deals like this together fast and efficiently, Neidorff said. We didn't want anything leaking, so time was of the essence.

Team players

Quickly, Neidorff said, he had a few trusted employees begin gathering Health Net's public documents to see if it was indeed a good fit.

In June, Neidorff, Jesse Hunter, Centene's chief business development officer, and Jeff Schwaneke, senior vice president, chief accounting officer, flew to California, with lawyers and Wells Fargo bankers in tow. Allen & Co. and Evercore Partners served as financial advisers to Centene, while Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom served as legal counsel.

On another occasion, Gellert and his crew, James Woys, CFO/COO, Kathleen Waters, general counsel, as well as other members of the company's finance and operations teams, visited St. Louis.

JP Morgan Securities served as financial adviser and Morgan Lewis & Bockius served as legal adviser to Health Net.

Bankers actually do most of the talking, Neidorff said, speaking generally about large-scale acquisitions. So trust is everything. We have used Wells Fargo and some of the other parties on multiple deals for quite some time. They handle things professionally, and we work well together.

But negotiating a deal that's good for Centene shareholders isn't always so easy.

We're about the acceleration of revenue and profitability, Schwaneke said, noting that without it, there can be no deal.

With a target deadline of July 1 to come to terms, the deal was announced July 2. It is expected to close in early 2016, awaiting regulatory and stockholder approval.

Bulking up

At least one analyst is making the case that after this deal, Centene is one of the big guys capable of influencing the industry with its own acquisitions and divestitures.

The title of a report released the day of the acquisition by Stifel Nicolaus analysts spells out the reaction: With all the M&A focus on the Big Guys, CNC makes a move to become one.

With the Health Net acquisition Centene will add more than 6 million new members. Almost as important will be its foothold in California's Medicare Advantage market, a state new to Centene. In total, Health Net has 297,133 members, based on Stifel research. That expands Centene from 25,915 Medicare Advantage members to 323,048 nationwide, giving the company a 2 percent market share in Medicare Advantage. It also gives the combined company the opportunity to merge products so they can take their managed care Medicaid to California and offer Health Net's products in other states.

We've got a very strong national leadership presence on the Medicaid side, but we've been working toward becoming a government solutions program for the Veterans Administration, Tricare (U.S. Department of Defense), Medicare, Neidorff said. By virtue of this relationship, we will have access to those areas.

Target? What target?

Centene was recently listed among the 10 best performing stocks in Missouri in the last five years, according to an analysis by financial technology company SmartAsset.

Matthew Borsch, a financial analyst with Goldman Sachs, said in a July 21 report that the Health Net deal shows Centene was quite serious when it insisted it was a buyer, not a seller. The deal also gives some added perspective to the state of the company, according to Borsch, who said it signals slower growth from within and makes CNC a less likely M&A (mergers and acquisitions) target.

Steven Halper, an analyst with FBR Capital Markets, said while there may be more growth through mergers and acquisitions, Centene's stock growth rate would likely slow over the coming five years, which could make it a challenge to reach analyst estimates by year end. The recent pullback in Centene's shares, the expectations of continued strong performance and the acquisition of Health Net make the risk/reward trade-off more compelling, he said in a July report.

Centene closed at $71.46 a share Aug. 5. That's near the upper end of its 52-week range of $35.49 to $83 a share. Most analysts have projected Centene's shares to be priced in the $83 to $86 a share range in March 2016 with Halper bullish at a $90 target.

Neidorff would not say whether other acquisitions are in the works, but did acknowledge that he's always on the hunt.

If the right deal comes along, we're always looking, he said.
